General Butler Come to Judgment.

There is balm for General Butler, if not in Gibrad, at least in the court of Gideon, the Surrogate. He has been beaten by General Heatregard and has lost his brother, Mr. An w.Jackson Botler; but the latter has left shind him a will, yesterday brought to pro-ate, by which one half of his estate, valued at two millions of dollars, is bequeathed to the hero of New Oricana and the martyr of B rmuds Hundred There is no rose, however, without its thorn; and the joy of his inherited million may posby be dashed to the illustrious legatee, by the inevitable inquiry which public curiosity will institute into the rigin of his legacy

He that maketh muste to be rich, we are ld, shall not be innocent; and as it is very generally understood that menter General Butler, nor his brother, Mr. Andrew Jackson Butler, brought into their joint aerwice of their belaved country any extraord nary contribu-tion of worldly goods, the presumption cannor well fall to seize in the public mind, that the General's absolute control of the lives and forcuses of the people of Louisians, during p ried of his dominion on the Gulf, may have had something to do with the amazingly rapid accomulation of the colosial fortune by he posthumous partition of which he is now to profit.
